The joke at the end here in the original was that rather than 共感覚 (kyoukankaku/synesthesia) the guy was experiencing 凶感覚 which also reads as kyoukankaku but the first kanji reverses the meaning of the rest. Sadly english isn't as versatile with homophones so some corners had to be cut.

Synesthesia itself is actually just a general term for a neurological phenomenom some people experience where they involuntarily associate certain types of stimuli with some kind of cognitive experience.
The type of synesthesia described in this page is a very common one called chromesthesia where some sounds make people see or experience colors.
There are all sorts of experiences related to chromesthesia. Some people say it's like seeing colors in a screen or a kaleidoscope. Others say it's like an explosion of colors akin to fireworks. Basically everyone has different experiences with it.
This type of synesthesia is also said to help a lot of musicias since it essentially lets them visualize their own music as colors.
There have been many famous musicians with chromesthesia such as the classic composers Nikolai Rimsky-Korsakov and Franz Liszt (who famously argued over the correct color of musical notes), film score composer Hans Zimmer (best known for his Academy Award-winning music in the Lion King) and Kanye West (I just thought that one was funny).
